History of Rayleigh

Rayleigh is a historic market town and is the main centre of population in the Rochford District. The town has retained much of its traditional character and is a busy shopping centre, well served by bus and train.

Rayleigh is mentioned in the Domesday Book. The manor of Rayleigh belonged to Sweyne of Essex, the son of Robert FitzWimarc who built a Norman Motte and Bailey castle in Rayleigh. The location is at Rayleigh Mount, which is today owned and maintained by the National Trust. From the top, there are sweeping views across the Crouch Valley.

The word "Rayleigh" is said to derive from two Anglo Saxon words, "Roe", a deer, and "leigh" a clearing in a forest.

The chartered weekly high street market is held on Wednesdays and dates back to 1181, when it was registered in the Exchequer Records of Henry II.

Rayleigh Windmill, built in 1809, is a popular venue for civil ceremonies. Rayleigh Mount, the Windmill, octagonal Dutch style Cottage, Martyr's Memorial and Holy Trinity Church are the most famous Rayleigh landmarks.

HISTORY OF THE TRINITY FAIR

Records show that the royal charter for Rayleigh's Ancient Trinity Fair dates to the year 1227. The fair was held in the High Street on Trinity Monday at the end of May, beginning of June, when the agricultural community all came together to trade various types of livestock, especially horses, as well as the annual gathering of the farm labourers.

It was not all work though and the local inns and taverns did a roaring trade which by the late 19th Century led to the well-known saying "as rowdy as Rayleigh's Trinity Fair". However this led to the Fair's closure in 1899 as it was considered to be just an excuse for all day drinking and riotous behaviour.
